

The old lighthouse stood alone on the cliff, its beam slicing through the thick fog. Every night, the keeper lit the flame, though no ships had passed in years. One stormy evening, a distant horn echoed from the sea, and a ghostly vessel emerged from the mist. The ship's captain, pale and solemn, saluted the keeper before vanishing into the night. The flame flickered once — and the lighthouse was never lit again.